Our quality of life depends on the quality of the environment - air, water, soil, plants, animals, forests, lakes and rivers. All these environmental components integrated into complex structures, and ecosystems, are influenced and modified in different proportions by all issues associated with socio-economic development. Consumption of natural resources, waste from all industrial processes, agricultural or domestic hydraulic structures, changing of the land use, producing large amount of synthetic chemicals (fertilizers, pesticides, pharmaceuticals, dyes, fibers, plastics, rubber), mass tourism, international trade, are factors that indicate development, but at the same time are factors that cause substantial changes in ecosystems. Because of these, the need to control and supervise the relationship between economic development and environmental quality, and to design and implement environmental policies and strategies become a priority.
